In (in), prep. Forms a 1- in, also 3 Orm. inn, 5 yn(e, ynne B. 2-6 i, i-, 3-4 y, 6- i- [Common Teut — OFris, OS, OHG, Goth IN, ON. (Sw., Da. i), cognate with L in, Gr ἐν

In OE, in all those texts where the word occurs, the full form in is used, but in early ME the apocopated i became common in certain dialects.

In the Ormulum, inn (inn) is employed before vowels and h, and i before all consonants except h. Early southern texts, such as the Lambeth and Cott Homilies, Juliana, St Kath, St Marher, Ancr R, etc, show a similar tendency, but with more or less irregularity, the MSS often differing in this respect, on the whole, i is preferred when the prep precedes the definite article or the demonstrative pronouns, as i þe, i þis, i þat In some of these texts (Ancr R, Lamb. Hom.) the relations of the two forms are further complicated by the use of in, which also appears (e.g. in Ayenb, Owl & Night, Shoreham) where I is rare or altogether wanting. The prevalence of I in these southern texts suggests that Ormin's use of this form was not due to Scandinavian influence, especially as northern writers (including Scottish down to 1600) always employed in, though i is common in the modern dialects. In standard English from the time of Chaucer in has been the normal form, but former colloquial usage is sometimes retained in verse in the combination i' th', or as an archaism in i' faith.

General Sense —The preposition expressing the relation of inclusion, situation, position, existence, or action, within limits of space, time, condition, circumstances, etc. In ancient times, expressing also (like L. in) motion or direction from a point outside to one within limits, the two senses being determined by the case of the word expressing the limits, the former taking the dative (originally locative), the latter the accusative or case of direction. These cases being subsequently levelled, this distinction ceased to be practicable, and the latter relation is now ordinarily expressed by the compound in-to, INTO, but there are various locutions in which (either because the accompanying verb conveys the sense of motion, or through the preservation of an ancient phrase without analysis) in still expresses motion from without to within.

In OE. (as in OS. and the same extent in OFris.) the prep. in was displaced by the prep on (WGer an, Goth ana), so that in classical and late Wsaxon, and to some extent in other OE dialects. on was used for both on and in, an emphatic or distinctive sense of in being however expressed by innan (See full details in Dr J. Miller, O.E. Version of Bede, Introd. pp. xxxvii–xl). Anglian, esp in the north and west, in remained (though, under WSax influence, often displaced by on in documents), and in ME. the distinction of in and on was gradually restored, though many traces of their former blending still remain (See sense 2.)

The formal coincidence of in with the L. prep in (with which it is originally cognate) led to its being employed, in translating from L., in senses or uses which were idiomatic in L, but not originally English. These also have affected the current contextual use of the preposition

I Of position or location

Primarily in (of position) is opposed to out of anything which in is a given space is not out of it, and vice versa. The compound with in, is mainly an equivalent of in emphasizing the relation to limits. The simple relation words nearest in use are at and on, with which in sometimes has common ground, e.g. i'm or at Oxford, i'm or on a street, i'm or on behalf of a man. In may also have common ground with with, as 'to travel in or with a caravan, a railway train, etc.'

1 Of place or position in space or anything having material extension. Within the limits or bounds of, within (any place or thing)

May relate to a space of any size, however large or small: e.g. in the universe, in the world, in heaven, in hell, in the earth, in the sea (otherwise on the earth, on the sea, at sea), in a field, wood, forest, desert, wilderness (but on a heath, moor, or common), in (U.S on) a street, in a house, carriage, box, drawer, nut shell, drop of water, etc.

II The Italian prep = Latin in, as in the phrases in festo, in petto, for which see the sbs

In, obs f Inn, var Hin pron Obs, him

In-, pref[1], the prep and adv In, in combination with verbs, verbal derivatives, and other words In original compound verbs, unaccented in passed in Ws into on (cf In prep, General Sense) e g Goth inlukjhan, OHG inluhten, to enlighten, illuminate, Goth inludnjan, OHG intgudan to set on fire, Goth inwandjan, OE inwendan to turn, change In such of these verbs as survived in ME, on- was normally reduced to a- But, in late OE, numerous new verbs in in- appeared as glosses or literal renderings of Latin verbs in in-, e g inhibbian = L inflare, inspirare to blow in, inhebbian = L inspirare to bring in, inhdian = I introducere to lead in The formation of these in similar circumstances continued in ME to the close of the 14th c, when numerous examples occur in Wyclif Among the ME examples are inclepe, L invocare to call in, indelve, I infodere to dig in, ingelt, L infundere to pour in, inlogge, L inflammare to inflame, inwalappen, I involvere to enwrap, inwelve, L inscribere to inscribe Few or none of these verbs have survived into mod English In OE the adv inn, in, was also freely used in collocation with verbs of motion or change of state The position of the adv was with the finite tenses, variable, in the infinitive it generally stood before the vb, and in derived verbal sbs and adjs always so Also in this position the adv came at length to be written in combination with the vb, e g income n, incoming, income sb, indwelle n, indwelling, indweller, etc In the infinitive and other verbal forms in- remained movable, and is now regularly placed after the verb, as in come in, go in, call in, lead in, etc, but the derived sbs and adjs when so formed are built of in- was invariable, have become regular compounds with stress on in-, thus incoming, income, incomer (beside come in), indwelling, indweller (beside dwell in), inlet, insight, intake, etc See In adv 11 (Cf the parallel case of German verbs with movable prefixes, as einwachen, einwachsen, eingangen, gehen ein, einlassen, einlegen etc) Inlight, ingang, eingehend, eingehen, eingeher, etc) There are also various other formations, OL, ME, or modern, in which this prefix occurs, usually with the sense in, within, internal, e g OE inghyd, inghan internal thought, intent, inland domestic land, ME inwit conscience, mod inborn, inside, inward, etc In a few instances prepositional phrases with in- have given rise to attributive combinations, as in college residents, in door occupations

As to the blending of this prefix and In- pref[2] in later use, see at the end of the latter

In-, pref[2], repr L in- adv and prep, used in combination with verbs or their derivatives, less commonly with other parts of speech, with the senses into in, within, on, upon, towards, against', sometimes expressing onward motion or continuance, sometimes intensive, sometimes transitive, and in other cases with little appreciable force

For m history In earlier L, in was generally retained unchanged before all consonants, but in later times it was assimilated to the following consonant, becoming il- before l, im before a labial, ir- before r These changes are retained in Eng e g illude, im-bue, im mit, im pel ir rotate see Il-, Im, Ir- In OF, in inherited words, in-, im, became en-, em, but learned words derived or formed from L, esp in later times, regularly retained in-, im- The French words were adopted in Eng in their current form, but from the 14th c

onward, there was a growing tendency in words in which the L derivation was evident, to change en-, em- back to L in , im , as in the words of learned origin This was even extended to some words which were not obviously, or not at all of L. origin, including some of those in which en-, em- was, as a living formative, prefixed to radicals of Ob. or other origin (See IN-) Conversely, some words directly from L were formed with the French en-, em- Hence, a large number of words occur in the 15th and 16th c with both forms of the prefix, and some have retained both forms to the present day, either with no distinction of sense, as in enclose, inclose, enquare, inquire, or with differentiation of use, as endure, inure The general tendency (though with numerous exceptions) has been to establish im-, im-, as that which, on grounds of etymology or analogy, appears to be the preferable form , obsolete words have been dealt with on the same principles, and cross-references have been given to the form under which each word is treated

Since IN-¹ and IN-² are identical in form, and to a great extent in sense, they come in later use to be felt as one and the same prefix , and it is this resulting prefix which appears in many words of later formation, formed upon native substantives or adjectives, in which in , im , has affinities at once with the prefix en , em-, from French, and with IN-, in

In-, pref ¹, the I at in , cognate with Gr a-, an-, Com Teut un , prefixed to adjs and their derivatives, rarely to other words, to express negation or privation , as felix happy, infelix unhappy, utilis useful, inutilis useless tocitus hurtful, innocuus unhurtful, innocent, doctus learned, indoctus unlearned In earlier Latin, in- was used before all consonants, but in later times was subjected to the same assimilations as IN ², as in il litteratus illiterate, im-munitus unmeasured, immense ir regularis without rule, irregular, and was besides reduced to i- before gn, as in i gnarus ignorant , i gnóscĕre not to take cognizance of, to overlook, forgive In a few OE words, L in- become en- as in IN ², e g enmitie, OF enemi enemy, OF envie envy , but most French words containing this prefix are of learned formation, and retain L in- (il-, im-, ir-) as is the case also in Eng with words derived either through French, or from L direct In Eng in (il , im , ir) is a living negative suffix for words of Latin or Romance origin, freely used even when no corresponding formation appears in Latin, in this use it interchanges to some extent with the OE negative un-, which is used in native or thoroughly naturalized words, e g unanimous unadvised, un , un ceremonious, un , un certain, unun communicative, un-, un-devout, un-, un-distinguishable In such cases the practice in the 16th and 17th c was to prefix the form with un , e g inadable, inarguable, inavailable, but the modern tendency is to restrict in to words obviously answering to Latin types, and to prefer un in other cases, as in unavoiding, unceasing, undevout

In-, pref ², of Lat origin, prefixed to OE and ME adjs, with intensive force In origin akin to IN- pref ¹, with the sense 'inly', 'intimately', 'thoroughly', and hence 'exceedingly', 'very' Examples OE indryhten most noble, infid very wise, inhold thoroughly loyal , ME inred deep red (On this prefix in the cognate langs , see Heyne 'Das intensive IN ', in Germania, new ser III 61)

-in, suffix ¹ Chem A modification of the chemical suffix -INE ², introduced into systematic nomenclature by Hofmann in 1866, used systematically in Watts' Dict Chem in 1866, and subsequently adopted by the Chemical Society, for the names of neutral substances, such as glycerides, glucosides, butter principles, colouring matters, and proteids, which are thus distinguished from names of alkaloids and basic substances in INE Examples, albumin, casein, fibrin, globulin, mucin, myosin, pepsin , cerebrin, chitin, chondrin, gelatin, lecithin , acetin, alizarin, olein, arbutin, cevotin, curcumin, dextrin, hæmatin, indigotin, inulin, rutin, palmitin purpurin, salicin, ulmin, vanillin Some of these were formerly spelt with -ine, and in that spelling had passed into popular use before the rectification of the nomenclature, esp de ricine, gelatine, margarine, which are still commonly so spelt in non-scientific use

1881 Chemical Society, Instructions to Abstractors ¶ 16 Basic substances should invariably be indicated by names ending in -in, as aniline, instead of -ine, the termination -in being restricted to certain neutral compounds, as glycerides, glucosides, butter principles, and proteids, such as palmitin, amygdalin, albumin

-in, suffix ², an obs variant of INE ¹ in adjs , as feminin, genuin, etc , also an occasional variant of -INE ⁴ —1 ina, as in ruin

-ina, suffix ¹, a Latin feminine suffix found in regina queen, extended in It or Sp , and thence in Eng use, to form feminine titles, as czar-ina (for Russ tsaritsa), and female Christian names, as Alexandr ina, Angel-ina, Christ ina Clement ina, Georg ina, Thomas-ina, Wilhelm ina, etc (Cf INE ⁴) It occurs also as a formative of some other words, as in concertina, seraphina, etc , names of musical instruments

-ina, suffix ², in words which are the neuter pl of L adjs in -inus, and in mod L words formed after them, used (in agreement with animalia animals, understood) to form names of groups of animals related to some typical genus, as Bombycina (genus Bombyx), etc

Sk.* (1876) II. i. 1 One thing is inconceivable, that the Lord's should, in its existing nation, accept of modern civilization

2 spec. As a philosophical term

The following distinctions in meaning, though disputed by some, are generally recognized: (a) Opposed to the fundamental laws of thought: self-contradictory, involving a contradiction in terms. (b) Repugnant to recognized axioms or established laws of nature: involving the absolution of ideas which have become inseparably linked in the human mind. (c) Involving a combination of facts which defies a proposition incredible to the ordinary mind. (d) Incapable of being represented by a mental image

1696 H. More Intid Ath i. 10 To What is inconceivable or contradictious, is nothing at all to us. 1754 Sherlock Disc. (1759) I. iii. 136 The Objection represents a Mystery as a Thing inconceivable and impossible. 1785 Reid Intell. Powers II. xiv. (1803) I. 305 Power without substance is inconceivable. 1809 Sir W. Hamilton Discuss., Notes Lectures (1852) I. 184 Is unconditioned is in cognisable and inconceivable. 1865 Mill Exam. Hamilton vi. (1872) 86 The first meaning of Inconceivable is, that of which the mind cannot form to itself any representation. In the first and most proper meaning Ibid. 90 It has extends the term inconceivable to every combination of facts which appears impossible. It was in this sense that the Antipodes were inconceivable. Ibid. 92 He [Hamilton] gives to the term a third sense. We conceive a thing only as we think it with its conditions. Whatever cannot be conceivable in this third sense, is simply the inexplicable. 1872 H. Spencer Princ. Psychol. (ed. 2) II. viii. § 437 Let me here define what I mean by inconceivable as distinguished from incredible or unbelievable. An inconceivable proposition is one of which the terms cannot by any effort be brought before consciousness in that relation which the proposition asserts between them. 1875 Jowett Plato (ed. 2) IV. 271 Even these inconceivable qualities of space may be made the subject of reasoning.

B as sb. A thing or quality that cannot be conceived

1706 Watts Horæ Lyr. I. 56 Nothing's found in thee But boundless inconceivables, And vast eternity! 1856–9 Sir W. Hamilton Metaph. xxxviii (1859) II. 373 They confound together these exclusive inconceivables into a single notion. 1865 Mill Exam. Hamilton 63 Inconceivables are incessantly becoming Conceivables as our experience becomes enlarged

Inconceivableness (inkɒnsī·văb'lnĕs) [f. prec. + -NESS.] The quality of being inconceivable

1661 Glanvill Lux Orient. vi. 57 We need go no further for an evidence of its inconceivableness. 1690 Locke Hum. Und. IV. iii. § 6 Men, who because of the inconceivableness of something they find in one, throw themselves violently into the contrary hypothesis. a 1740 Abernethy in Reid's Intell. Powers iv. iii. (1803) II. 63 The measure of impossibility to us is inconceivableness, that of which we can have no idea, but that reflecting upon it, it appears to be nothing. 1829 Spencer Prime Psychol. (ed. 2) II. 420 The inconceivableness of its negation is that which shows a cognition to possess the highest rank

Inconceivably (inkɒnsī·văblɪ), adv. [f. as prec. + -LY 2.] In an inconceivable manner or degree. Often exaggerative for 'extraordinarily', 'extremely', 'very highly'

1651 Baxter Inf. Bapt. 53 The Church of Christ is not in a worse condition now, but inconceivably better. 1711 Strype Ann. I. No. 167 p. 2 The ill Consequence of these Reviews is inconceivably great. 1748 Johnson Vanity Human Wishes p. 6 Amazed to find it without foundation, and placed inconceivably in emptiness and darkness. 1750 Gentleman No. 41 p. 253 Though its actual existence be inconceivably short. 1866 J. Martineau Ess. I. 19 The book is inconceivably absurd.

+ Inconce ptible, a. Obs. rare [IN- 3] = INCONCEIVABLE

1677 Hale Prim. Orig. Man 86 It is inconceptible how any such man that hath stood the shock of an eternal duration should after be corrupted or altered. Ibid. 89 But it is utterly impossible that mankind should be without a beginning, so it is utterly inconceptible that we should have any other original but this.

+ Inconce ption. Obs. rare [IN- 3] Want of conception or understanding

Indian summer. [Indian a 2.]

A period of calm, dry, mild weather, with hazy atmosphere, occurring in the late autumn in the Northern United States

(The name is generally attributed to the fact that the region in which these meteorological conditions are questions were originally noticed was still occupied by the Indians, but other more specific explanations have been essayed. In its origin it appears to have belong to do with the glowing autumnal tints of the foliage, with which it is sometimes associated. (The actual time of its occurrence and the climate of the weather upper also to vary for different regions see the quots.)
